

“Because we own all our equipment, we don't need to worry about looking out for rentals. We don't need to worry about demands for specialists like concrete asphalt cranes and transportation. We're a go-to company. We can go to our own back garden and start pulling these things in. And we've got the expertise and the local labor.”

Organization history stretches back to when managing partner and namesake Junior Sammy was an employee of a trucking business owned by his father, and handled transportation needs for several local companies. After the initial business experienced significant growth, Sammy and his father joined forces on a second company – Junior Sammy Contractors – which now serves as the corporate flagship.

Subsequent growth yielded creation of the group's asphalt paving and concrete plant (Jusamco Pavers) and he later acquired Sammy's Multilift Services, a heavy-haul, heavy crane and heavy transport mechanical and construction company, upon the death of a family member.

The significant expansions were not part of a master plan, Murphy said, but they are quite an indicative reflection of the Sammy family's business mindset.

“It was never a conscious decision that he was going to
